A performance-based interview tries to see how well someone might work in the future. This type of interview focuses on just a few important skills for the job instead of looking at many different things

How to prepare

First, list 5 or 6 important skills needed for the job. You can share this list with the candidate you are interviewing or use it to guide your questions. This interview uses two main questions:

Question 1: "Tell me about your biggest success in any of your skills".

You should ask this question about the 5 or 6 important skills. If the interviewee doesn't give you all the information you need. Ask more questions using the L.I.S.T.O method

Line of action: "What exactly did you do"?

Indicators of success: “How did you know you did well”?

System: “What tools. People, and managers helped you?”

Tasks: “Can you tell me more about this project”?

Time: “When did this happen and how long did it take”?

Obtain results: “What did you learn or what was the final result?”

Most people will give some of this information, but not many can respond to all of it. If someone does, they are great communicators.

Question 2: “How would you solve this problem?”

Then ask: “Can you give me an example of when you used something similar to solve it?”

This second question helps balance what you learned from the first one.

Pregunta 35 What is the primary focus of a performance-based interview?

Items 48-52 I Am Not My Hair: Finding Identity Outside Beauty Standards.

Music can encourage, persuade, and make people feel good. India Arie's "I Am Not My Hair" is a perfect example of a song with deep meaning that resonates with people of all ages and backgrounds the song's words are a powerful statement against social pressures to conform to beauty standards that can damage one's self-esteem.

Hair has a great impact on many people, both culturally and personally. It's not only about the physical parts of our heads; it represents our identity. Beauty standards often reflect whether people follow what others do or if they choose to be different with their hair. We use it to express ourselves based on our emotions and choices.

My journey with natural hair has been difficult. Like many others, I've faced negative comments about my hair choices and changes during my life. These experiences taught me that too often, we allow our hair to define our worth or beauty in ways that limit our self-expression.

More people now know that all hair types are good. Still many women feel bad about their hair. In our heads, we know "we are not our hair", but in our hearts, we still look at ourselves and others based on how hair looks. To stop caring so much about these old ideas of beauty, we try hard and get help from family, friends, and community support.

I encourage you to challenge these labels and accept your special hair story. Whether you wear your hair naturally straightened, colored, short, long, or covered- remember that your identity goes far deeper than what grows from your scalp. Your character, actions, and heart define you far more than your appearances ever could. What's your hair journey been like? Have you felt pressured to conform to certain standards? I'd love to hear your stories in the comments below.
